UNA AND THE LION.

No matter when it'll have been,
Or years ago, or but yester-on;
When life was in its golden Spring,
Or when its leaves were withering,
There lived a maid—I know him then—No matter where, no matter when——He was no fair; and frank and free As any human soul could be,
For every wrong he made amends;
Forgave all folk, improved all friends,
And loved all women, "neath the sun, Yet never gave his heart to one.
—Thus had he grown to manhood's prime;
And then he met, one fair Spring-day,
When snowdrops grow a hundred deep,
And violets just began to peep,
As sweet a little maid as you,
Or I, or any one of these (Oh, if I could but paint imitated!)
Her lips were roses cherry red;
Her eyelashes were like lilac white;
Her curls were brown the edge of night;
Her eyes were moonlight; and their beams Killed you with love's enchanted dream.
—He did not fall in love like you,
Who first fall in, then out again;
He grew to love her day by day—
Daily she stole new heart away—
And when he'd lost quite half his heart He offered her the other part.
—He said, "I thought, some time ago, My strength could match with any foe,
But then least thought I was in a net
From which I could not free my foot." (Indeed, it seemed he did prove Being caught, for he went near her:
"Nay, hear me, or thou speak again,
A silken cord shall join us brain;
Around my life you and I thus,
And I shall be as bound to thee,
Here, at thy feet I vouchsafed life, Fair Union thus, though I live."
—And conclude—how, they never know How life was in the place of two,
And loving one (the silken cords) Worn far more eloquent than words, Then let's a love then—happy then,
No matter whose, no matter when—
—From the dreary,

— Readers of this little story may be dis-to agree that the law has not yet pro-respectable solicitor of Bath, named Higginson, by reason of his amity local bird-stuffer, one Elbbelwot Grim-You must know that Mr. Higginson that he was so scrupulous in his clients, it had not occurred to him — a lawyer, always won their law.

One day Grimson the bird-stuffer to Haggel Higginson for professional His cause may have been sound or — many have been that Grimus was a p— on this point none of us have any an opinion—but at all events Hig-fused to take any case which was — a lawyer, with a flea in his ear.
— Grimson, stock-haired, beetle-browed irritable, and of a most vindictive When he returned to his shop he and flamingoes around him; he ever-— far as to kick a stuffed puma, the — Grimus had no wife to suggest providence. The ugly little man livin his shop, working all day long in sleeves; and whilst at work he had time to brood. He would turn an and over in his mind as more peace-brew a cud; and there were times chew a cud, and there were times — might be sure that he was wicked plan with which to injure an enemy.

The vengeance which this fellow imagined as regards Haggai Higgins, at once ingenious and fierce.

In addition to his stuffed birds, G the usual live stock of men of his dogs, warrens, game-birds, and parrots, bearded a great parrot, endowed with a beautiful grey plumage, and a long beak, whose cry, in its distinctive note, had bestowed much pains on the thief, who felt that he hoped to sell on a high price; but he had never suspected deep were this bird's powers of wit and memory, till one afternoon, being in his shop and abusing his enemy, he heard a voice repeat in startling tones "Haggai a thief."

"Who's there?" said Grimrod, round about frightened, for the parrot's words gave him no clue.

"I can guess that it was the parrot speaking."

"Haggai a thief!" repeated dancing gravely on its perch; and then perceived who it was that had echoed thoughts so opportunely.

"Oh, you jewel of a bird!" cried Grimrod, running to the cupboard he brought a strip of nice raw beef which he presented to the parrot as a thank-offering.

"You're a good fellow," rubbed his beak fully as melodramatically villainous do clever birds," exclaimed he; "he's repeat that Haggai a thief, and he'll be a thief. Now I'll just stick his side my door, and whenever Haggai comes, he'll hear what we think of him place, and it won't be like other laws can't touch the bird nor prove it."

Grimes's short-sleeved shirt covered him in the busiest part of town and Haggen, Higginson's office were. Several times a day the solicitor in the first-shuffer's place of business, evident that if Poll could be train him every time he went by a frug of annoyance would arise. The frug preoccupied Grimes was how to co-telligence of his parrot in such a world-known Higginson-by-sign full girth, long-sleeved shirt, and tie that did not seem easy, for Grimes other bipeds, are fond of having way; but Grimes went to work patience which is only known to him. He neglected his business for. It that he might teach the parrot to a simple code of signals which At last the parrot got to under that when Grimes uttered three he must cry, "Haggen's a thief," of getting a check or two on the other side of the street. It was the first of his life if the parrot sang the word of him his was rewarded those luscious bits of raw meat loved better than anything on faculty for deductive argument fowls as in men, and once he learned his lesson he never forgot.

So one bright market-day, when full of farmers, drovers, and cowboys the parrot stood on its perch at the enjoying the sun. Grimes was stuffy a bull-dog, but at his cotton-wool, and stick him little deceased angler, he kept one of the small, wrinkled eyes fixed on the door of Mr. Higginson's office. Suddenly the lawyer emerged, pompous and starched, and instantly hate was lifted to him; for he was universally feared. Grimes gave three low whistles. This was just as Mr. Higginson was wearing the shop, and straightway the bird arched its neck, saying: "Hagga! a thief!" "No, no!" was the answer expected that the lawyer stopped short on the pavement, dumfounded. "Hagga! a thief—a thief—a thief!" repeated the parrot excitedly; for his master continued to whistle softly in a minor key. There was quite a crowd now at the door, farmers, yokels, and jills and jakes who guffawed and jeered at the lawyer. Mr. Higginson, with indignation, walked on. He was not popular in the town (very virtuous men as a rule), and there were possibly many folks who, like Grimes—had private reasons for laughing at his discomforts. But the bird-infer was astute enough. Not to worry things too far, and not wishing to let what he pretended to be in great anxiety about at what had happened, "Why, what has the bird been saying?" cried he.

"He's been called Lawyer Higginson a thief," answered a stout farmer, laughing as if his waistcoat would burst.

"God bless my soul you can have told him that!" replied Higginson, with affected sadness and awe, "and now this he did his name tenfold more harm than if he had joined in the laughter. It was, moreover, noticed, that he pulled in the perch at once and valiantly scolded his parrot; so all this afternoon at the different inns and market-places he met the farmers, cattle dealers, and chandlers, horse-dealers, and others, and a quiet joke was their custom, saying: "Who told you that parrot that Hagga is a thief?"

Meanwhile, Haggai Higginson had walked straight, but to the town-hall and asked the magistrates for a summons against Elshuwh Grimes. The summons were sent all the following day, but was not received until the following day, and he had, therefore, so that in the interval the bird-stuffer had plenty of time to go to pursue his vengeance coolly. He did not miss his chance either. Every time the lawyer walked out of his office the parrot, standing on its perch, flapped his wings and uttered his throat, screeching: "Haggai's a thief."

On the first day poor Higginson faced the parrot bravely enough; on the second day he winced, feeling that he was becoming a laughing-stock to the whole town; but on the third day he no longer had the courage to pass Grimes's shop, and struck a hasty retreat to his market-place slaving, with a broken hat, and an empty pocket, and on his countenance an extremely mean look that Haggai Higginson was extremely sensitive. Consequently all this to-do with the parrot mortified him deeply after his first anger was spent. He felt that as a result of all his staid conduct during many years he was now in the eyes of the town almost without a friend. He felt that, in fact, he was the laughing-stock of the whole town, and almost all the town. The bird's joke had blasted it. Nevertheless, Mr. Higginson was one of those men who have a holy faith in Acts of Parliament, and he felt sure that a law could be raked out of the statute-book to put down Grimes's parrot.

Also the event proved him to have been over sanguine. He had thought that if Grimes appeared before the magistrate, Mr. Higginson, who conducted his own case, failed to procure a single witness who could testify that the defendant had taught his parrot to cry: "Haggai's a thief." Higginson even incurred

"We are sorry for you, Mr. Higginson," said the Chairman, smothering a laugh; "but you have no case at law in this court. You charge an offence for causing a disturbance, but must fall through, since that the parrot is not a nuisance to any one save your self, and that even you need not pass within reach of his voice unless you please."

"But, sir," stammered Mr. Higginson, white with dismay, "I have a case, surely, in that the dog is a nuisance to me, in the same sense as a dog who snaps at my calves when I walk out?"

"The dog may be supposed to have the intention of biting. Did the parrot try to bite you?"

"I don't think, sir, that I am bound to prove the intention of biting."

"Do you believe, then, that you could sue the master of a dog who merely barked at you?"

"If his bark annoyed or frightened me, if it were persistent, for I am a coward," "Then if you or your neighbours rate persistently against me, when you passed the house, I am resigned, do you think you could ask protection of this court by simply declaring that the cat frightened you?" "There was an outburst of laughter in court, and the wretched Higginson, gawky and plethoric, sat down nuplessed, and made lubs at his moistened brow with his pocket handkerchief. He had overheard his neighbours and found that there was nothing about the parrots in them. The defendant left the court amid the plauditory cheers of a rabble of commoners, and the plaintiff remained in court to pay the cost of the summons and to receive the condolences of the Bench."

But when Higginson returned home he felt persecuted that the spirit of the law must have been violated in his person. "There is to be wrong without a remedy." These words so often repeated as a truism, by judges, who were cropping up in his mind, and who considered what was the particular remedy which he sought, for his forefathers had been questioned to him, against the wrong-doing of Grimes's parrot.

If Grimes had been the publisher of a newspaper, and told the truth about Higginson day after day, Higginson might have brought an action against him, had his foolishness been sufficient to induce him to adopt such courses. But: could the parrot be assimilated to a news-agent? Obviously not, for the publisher of a newspaper is responsible for what appears in his journal, whereas it was impossible to suppose that Grimes had any such of responsibility in the words which the parrot, a mere unconscious bird, uttered. No one would any action for damages properly against Grimes in any section of the Court. Judicate, failing proof positive of his having connived at the parrot's slander. On the whole, Haggai Higginson felt that he saw that he had no remedy, and that any attempt to obtain legal redress for the most injurious slander in history would result in a good deal of money and being covered with ridicule.

Under the circumstances, Higginson sat his head between his hands and pondered what he should do? It is an axiom of universal polity that where the law is powerless to protect individuals society releases liability for itself, and that every body must protect himself the best he can. The law, in conservative countries, is so far as to allow individuals to protect himself as he may in emergencies, such as the attack of a mad dog, or a thief, of a madman, &c. Now, Grimes' parrot was destructive of Higginson's peace—a danger and a scandal to him. So the lawyer judged the law before the tribune of his own conscience and calmly condemned him to die.

It was a solemn moment, that in which the solicitor decided that he was justified in taking the law into his own hands. He thrilled at the idea of the step he was about to take. He walked twice to a looking-glass and admired himself stercorally, as though he was seeking to assure himself by a glance in his own features that he was quite sober.

The man had determined through study locks, caught up his hat and walked in the street he met an intimate friend to him, was a lawyer, but who once—years ago—had been a drink-soldier, boy in the city, regiments and regiments, but the artist was valuable. "Follow," he said; "I want you to lead me to that parrot is asleep, and if he is, to witness of something I am going to do."
 The drummer followed him respectfully.
 Higginson reached Grimes's shop. It was midnight, but strange to see the man as he lay in bed, and the parrot to discover. "Knock at the door," said Higginson to the ex-drummer; when they open, step in as though you are paying a visit." The drummer knocked.
 He laid open the door, and when he realized he had business of importance with Grimes, he was in the room. The parrot was on the one side of the fire and the man asleep; on the opposite side was a parrot, also wrapped in the arms of Morris. On tiptoes the ex-drummer returned to the front door. "Hiss!" he said. "All right; they are both asleep; come in." Hig-ginson, trembling in all his limbs, entered the room, and found the ex-drummer, during sleep, in fact, the organ of the parrot, and then stood before the sleeping parrot. His arms were severely hurt over his breast, and the ex-drummer said with awe. In a low and trembling voice he said: "You have called me a thief; you have insulted me." Then he drew himself up and waited for full one minute to attack him; but he was unconscious and he was now drawing a thick skin from over his left-hand, seized the drum around the neck; there was a squeal, and the parrot was dead. A sequel, however, assailed the cheek of Haggai.
 His wrath was not yet appeased. Fiercely killed his first, he heard the dead man uttering and he tore out of his feelings. Then he and he found a man in a hairloom in his ally, like the sabre demon pira in that of noble house of Gerolstein. With this consent he beat the perch from which his and proclaimed him a thief. The blows rained through the parrot. Grimes ended unceasingly in his sleep. — The last and a serpent, the "villain." — Grimes and the ex-drummer. So they crawled of the shop on all-fours. When they again in the street, they clapped each s' hands. — "Hycow, want any one to wear on you are a man of mettle, you may declare on me," observed the ex-drummer.

 Grimes smiled, and, with a wave of his hand, he pointed to his home. When he told Grimes what had occurred there. Were they as and implied, but they went down to their and his home never again to incur terrible a risk.
 An hour later Grimes awoke. On the floor he found the corpse of his parrot. Yet when he was disturbed, not a word was dead.
 Grimes pushed open the door. He rushed out and looked wildly at the door.
 The door was doubly locked and chained, but the window above was thrown up, and from it the melodious Hippogonist looked down. "I w the parrot," he shouted, "and if it is as again 'Haggi' is a thief," I will not him. If you could not do it, I will not But Grimes did not take this advice. He He tapped the parrot and exhibited it before his up. Beneath the unhappy victim he had taken the tale of Haggi, and the parrot.
 When the farmers, drivers, and coach-drivers did not they laughed, but Haggi Hipgones read it even smile. — Quail.

THE DEFENCE OF MESOLONGI
 What heart capable of any generous feelings does not huddle at the name of Mesolongi the second defence of these mud walls is so close to the second of the world's history the month of being men. Month of the little band of heroes behind the sea covered with the camp and the fleets the barbarians; as far as the eye could see, the abandonment of desolation in so very, very vast and wide. Yet not a word of surrender; what more, what more in their hands could dress it, while they saw priests and women and children writhing on the stake beneath their walls till came that terrible night, that fearful and, which surpasses the tale of the of the world's history. The brave heroes of Be-not the disciplined battalions of Bra-could endure that desperate charge.
 Mesolongi fell, till she fell as Saguntum, as Mantua, and as Zaragoza; and a cry went from her ruins which brought down the presence of God and man.

Historical Essay, by Edward A. Freeman.

PRIZE-FIGHTER'S TRAINING FOR CONGRESS.

An American paper thus describes how Mr. John Morrissey, well known as a prize-fighter, went to the Congress, as told by his wife:—"John and I were married twenty-five years ago. It was just after the war, the Sullivan fight. We were married after he went John Homan; and, although in those days when he went into the ring I always went with him from me with the injunction to beat this man, my soul revolved at the thought of a prize battle. But it was my great hope to leave him succeed in life. He came back from California and visited our house in New York to bring some message from my brother, whom he had left there. In two weeks after that we were engaged, and in three weeks after that we were married. I knew John was a rough, little boy about Troy, barefooted and ill-digested, always looking for a fight. When we were married, he could not read or write, and, to tell the truth, I was only a trifle better off in the matter of educational advantages. I told him he must learn to read, and, he said I should teach him. Well, we established lesson hours. Every night before going to bed he would say himself to his 'sparring' partner, 'I will conquer one to-day.' I would write in a copy book. The rule study was inflexible. We made it so. This morning after he fought John C. Homan, when he was all sore and bandaged, and blind of one eye as well, I propped him with pillows and made him write. He was my pupil till his fatal illness. Every night he studied something, and I studied during the day."

of course when I study I don't mean in the ordinary school's children's way. After we mastered the English branches we took up history, and when we was pretty well posted in that we made the living topics of the day a matter of investigation—the European news, the speeches of the great men. I read them in the daytime and John would go through them at nights. Then we took up such books as De Quincey's writings of Carlyle, and though I was miserably weak a gambler, and by profession made many enemies, I was crowned upon him, I had possessed of knowledge on many subjects independent of city politics and horse racing, which would have put to blush the sternest critics had they been in competition with him. He would say, 'Now, this is no good for me, Susie'; but I pressed him on and he would soon get interested. Then he had, such an insupportable perseverance. When he found a thing he could not readily understand he would master it out of very spite. I remember one of his shewing down his articles on authority after we was married, and these remaining potently, 'I don't care about these fractions—they're only part of a thing; any way! What's the use of all this study, Susie?' John, said I, 'If you don't beat these fractions, you will never go to Congress.' 'Oh! that's your big trump for me is it?' 'Yes, indeed, my boy,' I replied, 'and he took up his book again and said, 'All right, my dear; we'll go to Congress.' And he did.
